Why isn't payment by one parent or the other of health insurance premiums to cover the children, handled just like any other out of pocket medical expense? Do not deduct it in computing child support, just split the cost the same as any other out of pocket medical expense. This would seem to me to be most fair to all involved. Either the father or mother should obtain the health insurance that would be the best or most economical coverage available based on the children's needs and for all involved. If they can not agree on the best coverage, the friend of the court could get involved.
